Description of incident	The worker was using a battery-operated reciprocating saw to remove redundant drainage copper pipework. As the worker was cutting through the pipe, the tip of the saw blade contacted the concrete slab above the pipework causing the blade to deflect and contacted the pipe parallel resulting in two small teeth puncture holes. This caused the punctured pipe to release nitrous oxide into the environment. The worker ceased works, vacated the plant room, and restricted access to any other person until the service was isolated by hospital maintenance. The service was repaired by the hospital appointed medical gas contractor and was tested by the anaesthetist to ensure correct operation post repairs.
